Jeanne Duval, who was sixteen, had decided to spend the holidays with her friends. It was her first trip without her parents. She wanted to meet her friends at the airport. She was going there by train, and, after that, everyone would be together.

She asked her father to take her to the station. They set out at eight o'clock. However, there was a lot of traffic in the centre and all the cars were moving forward very slowly. They had to be very patient.

Unfortunately they arrived late. They stopped in front of the station. Once inside the building, they saw to their horror that the train was no longer there. Jeanne started to cry but Monsieur Duval told her that they would try to follow it as far as the next town.

They got back into the car. Monsieur Duval drove at full speed and, five minutes later, they realised that they were very close to the train. Soon afterwards, they arrived at their destination. They were already standing on the platform when the train entered the station.

There were lots of other travellers. In spite of the crowd, Jeanne managed to find an empty seat and, after saying goodbye to her father, sat down. She was very happy now as she knew she hadn't missed her trip after all.
